In grecting the Soviet guests, Dvorak declared that the treaty was of enormous importance for the development of Czechoslovakia. Noting that industrial production in Czechoslovakia has increased four times over 1937, the ambassador said: "We are proud that Czechoslovakia and the other countries of the socialist camp has proved the advantages of socialist society over capitalist society."

In reply Deputy Chairman of the USSR Council of Ministers Kosygin emphasized that the Soviet-Czechoslovak treaty was a firm foundation for establishing true fraternal relations between the USSR and Czechoslovakia.

Today, said Kosygin, we can note with satisfaction that during the 17 years which have elapsed since the signing of the treaty friendship and cooperation between the Soviet and Czechoslovak peoples have successfully withstood the test of time and have yielded rich fruit.

The notable successes of Czechoslovakia, stated Kosygin, were reached because of proper application of the practical principles of Marxism-Leninism, through the monolithic unity and unprecedented enthusiasm of the Czechoslovak people, and through close cooperation with the peoples of all socialist countries.

The deputy chairmant of the USSR Council of Ministers noted that today the whole world is learning the results of the conference of representatives of the conference of communist and workers parties, (which?) marked a new stage in the development of the Marxist-Leninist teaching, in the struggle by the communist and workers parties for a peaceful and happy future for mankind.

A great contribution to this (common cause?), said Kosygin, was made by the Communist Party of (words indistinct) for the purity of Marxism-Leninism, and which has waged an irreconcilable struggle against revisionism and dogastism.

(Sergey Vishnevskiy comment on U.S. policy toward Cuba in answer to a question by T.G. Ryan of Atlanta, Georgia)

(Excerpts) First I would like to draw Mr. Ryan's attention to an interesting statement made by Allen Dulles, chief of the CIA, last Aug. 22. His speech, as usual, dealt with the so-called dangers threatening the United States. He named Cuba the nearest country to the United States where dangerous developments were going on. Further, the head of the intelligence agency called for a well-coordinated program of enlightenment and actions to liquidate such developments.
